Self-Evaluation Forms for Schools

The following forms can be used to evaluate teachers' and students' perceptions of how Open Circle has changed different aspects of their behavior and the school/classroom environment. Most of the questions included in this evaluation stand alone: the percentage of participants giving each response can be calculated directly. However, the School Climate items (#20-38) comprise a scale (Developmental Studies Center, Oakland, CA, 1995). To obtain a scale score, you must first reverse-score items 20, 22, 25, 27, 32, 35, and 37 by subtracting the item value from 6. Next, all scale items should be averaged (missing values should not enter into the calculation). The resulting score will be on a scale from 1 to 5 and can be interpreted in the same way as the individual items (i.e., scores closer to 1 mean a less supportive school climate, etc.). In addition, four subscale scores* can be computed with responses from items 21, 25, 26, 27, 32, and 37 (Positive Relations Among Students), items 20, 28, 29, 31, 35, 36, and 38 (Faculty Collegiality), items 22, 23, 24, and 30 (Positive Student-Teacher Relations), and items 33 and 34 (Shared Educational Goals and Values). All other items on these surveys should be treated and interpreted as individual items.

Evaluation of the data can be as simple as examining frequencies of the responses across all the participants, or the frequencies of subsets of participants can be compared (e.g., male students versus female students). Differences between frequencies for two or more subgroups may be tested for statistical significance if certain requirements are met (please consult a statistician). It is possible to tell how much participants value different aspects of the program, an important facet to the success of the program. Still, we cannot know from these evaluations alone whether or not there has been real behavioral or environmental change, nor can we attribute any perceived change to true program effects without conducting a controlled, scientific study.

We would appreciate any feedback you might have to improve these evaluation forms. Comments should be addressed to:

* Coefficients of internal consistency (Cronbach's Alpha): Positive Relations Among Students = .86-.90, Faculty Collegiality = .89-.91, Positive Student-Teacher Relations = .63-.74, and Shared Educational Goals & Values = .84-.88
